

Eviction Notices

Before a landlord can legally evict you from the property, they must send you an eviction notice.

All eviction notices in Wisconsin must:

1. Be in writing.
2. State whether you can fix the problem and can stay (“right to cure”), or if you just have to leave.
3. State the number of days you have to take action on number two - either fixing the problem or moving out, depending on the notice - before the landlord can move on to the next step of the eviction process.

Note: The number of days you have to take action does not count the day the notice was given to you by the landlord.

4. State whether there is money owed (should include the amount) and/or the lease rule that the landlord believes you have broken.

Depending on your tenancy, the timeframe in the notice may be 5, 14, or 30-days. So let’s talk quickly about different types of tenancies.

1. Many residential tenancies are term tenancies. This is when, whether your lease is written or simply a verbal agreement, you and your landlord have agreed on an end date to your tenancy. Residential term tenancies are often one year long, though they do not have to be.

2. Another common type of tenancy is a periodic tenancy (e.g. month-to-month). You have this kind of tenancy if you pay rent on a regular basis (usually monthly or weekly) AND you and your landlord have not agreed to an end date to your tenancy.
3. If you and your landlord have not agreed to an end date to your tenancy and you do not pay rent on a regular basis, you are a tenant-at-will.

Here's a chart that shows what kind of eviction notice the landlord is required to give you depending on your tenancy type:

Tenancies with no end date	Term Lease for a year or less	Term lease for more than 1 year
<ul style="list-style-type: none"> • Periodic • Tenant-at-Will
Either: - a 5-day notice with a right to cure or - a 14-day notice with NO right to cure	A 5-day notice with a right to cure, for the 1st violation within a calendar year. or A 14-day notice with NO right to cure for the 2nd (and after) violations within a calendar year.	A 30-day notice with a right to cure
Landlord can always choose which of these 2 notices to give to tenant.	First violation in calendar year - landlord must give 5 day notice with right to cure. After 1st violation in calendar year, landlord can choose which of these two notices to give to tenant.	N/A - only 1 option

Caution: A landlord can also terminate a periodic tenancy or tenancy-at-will with a 28-day notice for any reason or no reason at all, so long as it is not because of discrimination or retaliation. To learn more about 28-day notices, see our article How to End a Tenancy Early.

No matter your type of tenancy, there are three situations where the landlord is allowed to give a 5-day notice with NO right to cure:

1. If a law-enforcement agency gives the landlord written notice that drugs are being made or shared either in your unit or by you on the landlord's property, or that criminal gangs are meeting in your unit.
2. You pose a threat of immediate physical harm to another tenant or their child(ren) if you stayed and the other tenant or their child(ren) has a restraining order against you or a criminal complaint has been filed against you for your actions against the tenant or their child(ren).
3. If anyone in your household, including guests, engages in either:
 - a. Criminal actions that risks the health, safety, or right to peaceful enjoyment of other tenants or people nearby
 - OR
 - b. Drug-related criminal actions on or near the landlord's property.

Note: if you decide to go to court and argue against the eviction from a 5-day notice with no right to cure, the burden of proof is not the same as it is in criminal court. In criminal court, the state must prove you committed a crime "beyond a reasonable doubt". Here, the landlord only must prove you committed the act by a "preponderance of the credible evidence". It is a confusing phrase, but the important thing to know is that it makes it easier for the landlord to prove you committed the crime.

How should I receive the eviction notice from my landlord?

The landlord has several options on how to give you notice. They, or someone who works for them, can:

1. Mail a copy by registered or certified mail.
2. Give it to you or someone in your household who's over 14 and explain what it is.
3. Leave a copy with a competent person who seems to live in your household and also mail a copy to your last-known address.
4. If they try to give it to somebody but can't find anyone to leave it with, they can leave a copy of the notice somewhere it will easily be found at the rental property and mail you a copy.

Because most notices are sent by certified mail, it is very important that you get any certified mail sent to you. It is never a defense that you did not pick up your certified mail or didn't know that you had certified mail.

What do I do if I receive an eviction notice?

Do not ignore the notice. You have three options depending on the notice you receive:

1. Fix the problem and stay in the rental

- a. This mostly applies if the landlord is required or chooses to give you a notice with a “right to cure”. This type of notice says that if you do what it asks within the given time, (ex: fix a violation or pay the full amount due) you can keep living there. After you fix the problem, write a letter to the landlord saying what you did and when. Keep a copy of this letter and any payments you may have made.
 - If you pay in cash, the landlord has to give you a receipt. If they won't, bring a witness, note down what you paid and when, and file a complaint with the Department of Agriculture, Trade, and Consumer Protection.
 - If you don't agree with the amount the landlord claims you owe but agree that you owe something, you should pay what you believe you owe within the time set.

Note: During this time period a landlord cannot kick you out, refuse your rent payments, or take you to court.

- b. What if I get a notice without the option to fix the violation?
 - You can still try to fix the problem and negotiate with the landlord to allow you to stay in the rental property, but the landlord is under no obligation to make an agreement with you. Make sure to document all of your attempts to fix the issue and if you come to any agreement with the landlord make sure to get it in writing!

2. Contest the violation and stay in the rental

- If you think the landlord has no legal reason to evict you, you can choose to stay put. The landlord will have to take you to court and prove you broke the lease and that they gave you the correct notices. If the judge agrees with you and finds no legal reason to evict you, the eviction might be dismissed. This gets noted down in public records. But winning might not always help because a future landlord could turn down your rental application just because you were involved in a lawsuit with your old landlord.

WARNING: there are also risks for staying in the rental. If the landlord wins the eviction case against you, the court could decide that you owe at least double the prorated rent for each day you remained on the rental property after the notice expired.

3. Move out within the time frame stated in the eviction notice

- Moving out means that you and any personal belongings you want are out of the unit. If you do not want an eviction case on your record, this is a good option. If you decide to move out, give your landlord a notice in writing of your move out date (and keep a copy for yourself) and be sure to return the keys, because the landlord has an obligation to try to re-rent the unit once they know you are out.

Note: even if you move out, you will still be responsible for rent until a new tenant moves into your apartment or your lease ends. While moving out might help keep an eviction off of your record (which is important!), the landlord may still take you to small claims court for money if your security deposit does not cover all that you owe them.

Illegal eviction rules in leases

Sometimes, landlords try to include eviction rules in the lease that aren't allowed by Wisconsin state law. Even if they are written in the lease you signed, they are not valid.

For example:

- A landlord cannot state that they can evict you because you called the police or emergency services. Additionally, you cannot be prosecuted for possession of any illegal drugs or paraphernalia you might have on you at the time you call for help for someone who is experiencing a drug overdose.
- A landlord cannot state that they have the right to evict you based purely on the fact that a crime occurred on the rental property that you could not have reasonably prevented, or if you or someone who lawfully lives with you is the victim of that crime.
- A landlord cannot state that they are permitted to evict you for being the victim of a crime of domestic violence related to the rental property.
- A landlord cannot state that they can evict you without using the court process.

What if I think the eviction notice lists the wrong amount of rent or late fees owed?

According to the law in Wisconsin, the notice is still valid even with the wrong amount listed unless:

- The landlord intentionally wrote the wrong amount.
- You paid the amount you believe you owe.

It can be very helpful to immediately ask for a copy of the “ledger” from the landlord which shows a history of your debits and payments to them. This ledger should show how they arrived at the amount they say you owe. You should carefully check the ledger for any internal inconsistencies or mismatches with your own records.

It can also be helpful to review the lease agreement to make sure you understand the rules about rent, fees, and other financial requirements.

If after all of this you pay the amount you believe is correct and you go to court, you and the landlord will have the chance to provide proof as to why your amount is the correct amount. If the court official believes you have paid everything you owed, the case will be dismissed. If the court official believes the landlord listed the correct amount in the notice, the eviction case will proceed. If the court official believes you are both wrong about the amount, the case may be dismissed, but the landlord can give you a new eviction notice with the correct amount owed on it.
